It wasn't until 1999 that NATO decided to finally upgrade its amphibious fleet in a bid to counterbalance Russian/Chinese naval power in the Western Pacific. A decade later, Russia still stands alone in its use of nuclear weapons (besides the occasional Russian submarines and ships) while the United States and NATO have begun the transition to a new generation of quiet, stealthy attack submarines and aircraft carriers that will be part of a new generation of defense strategy and doctrine. Both the U.S. and NATO have begun their own rearmament programs. Since the end of the Cold War, the United States has dramatically decreased its commitment to large-scale conventional warfare—that is, to large numbers of troops and expensive weapons systems. A host of spending cuts and reductions in military force deployments have trimmed U.S. military capabilities to a bare minimum. And yet, the U.S. still deploys 80,000 troops to around 150 countries. Add in the two Navy carrier strike groups that have been dispatched to the Strait of Hormuz, along with the Air Force's B-2 bombers, and you get a strong military presence in a zone where the U.S. needs to tread carefully. The U.S. Marine Corps continues to increase its role in non-combat operations. In 2007, it deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan. It's currently training and advising Afghan troops, participating in counter-terrorism missions, and conducting humanitarian operations in the Horn of Africa. But the Marines are better equipped for combat than they were in 2007 and still rely heavily on infantry. NATO is also increasing its commitment to peacekeeping. The alliance began with a limited military mission, and in 1995 it was assigned a smaller mission in Bosnia, not involving ground troops. In 1999, NATO took a greater interest, and the alliance is now active in 22 countries. More than a dozen countries have
