The Trump administration has announced it will build 1,200 new immigration detention beds as part of a sweeping plan that will add more than 11,000 beds for undocumented migrants. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) Commissioner Ronald Vitiello and Department of Homeland Security (DHS) Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen on Wednesday outlined plans to expand detention facilities in the US. "We are pushing against each other to show the same office of Immigration and Customs Enforcement can be broken up into two independent, functional units," Mr Vitiello said. "We are ashamed of how they are treating their own... they never hear an explanation for the conditions that they are holding people. "The American people want to see a functional, responsible and secure immigration system. So the President has directed us to put more beds in our system. We will be doing that. "We believe there is a big public safety risk to our communities" if more people are released into the US, he added. Mr Vitiello previously told Congress that the country's undocumented migrant population had grown to an estimated 11 million, though it is not clear how that number was reached. The administration has toughened its stance on immigration in the past year. Mr Trump has moved to ban travellers from several majority-Muslim countries and send migrants to Mexico while they wait for immigration cases to be heard. More than 144,000 people were taken into immigration detention from October to February this year, according to a new report by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, a
