The experiments described in this project include acute and chronic in vivo studies using whole mouse, rat, and human islets (both in terms of isolated islets and in terms of islets in organ culture), and studies using isolated, cultured beta cells. Four specific aims are proposed. First, the hypothesis will be tested that both acute and chronic toxicity of TiO2 nanoparticles to the islet beta cell is mediated by reactive fatty acids derived from TiO2 nanoparticle-catalyzed lipoperoxidation of the islet cell membrane. Second, the hypothesis that mice and rats are more susceptible to the effects of TiO2 nanoparticles on the islet cell than do humans will be tested. Third, the hypothesis that susceptibility of the islet to TiO2 nanoparticles is increased by co-administration with agents which exacerbate islet lipoperoxidation will be tested by evaluating the effect of co-administration of these agents on acute and chronic toxicity of TiO2 nanoparticles. Fourth, the hypothesis that the acute and chronic effects of TiO2 nanoparticles on the islet are mediated by reactive fatty acids derived from islet cell membrane lipoperoxidation will be tested by comparing the effects on islet function of the two most toxic TiO2 nanoparticles and of known reactive fatty acids. Relevance: The prevalence of diabetes is increasing, and therapeutic treatments are expensive and limited. The results of this work will provide the first insight
